

KEY GUIDE

Pensions tax planning for high earners

The rising tax burden on income

If you are a high-earner and feel you are paying more and more tax, you are not alone. More than one in seven income tax payers are taxed at the higher, additional or top rate and they pay about two thirds of all income tax.

Increasing the tax burden for higher earners has been a deliberate policy of successive governments. For instance, the thresholds for phasing out the personal allowance and the start of the additional rate tax threshold have both been unchanged since they came into force in April 2010.

Although the point at which you start to pay 40% income tax is £46,350 for 2018/19 (except in Scotland, which has different income tax rates and thresholds), it has increased at about half the rate of inflation over the past ten years. You may also be feeling the impact of the tax on child benefit, which applies to those with income over a £50,000 threshold (frozen since January 2013), or you may be subject to the increased marginal rates of tax on dividends, introduced in 2016/17.

The message is clear: if you want to reduce the amount of tax that you pay the solution is in your own hands. Planning could help you to lessen the rising tax burden – and we're here to help.

This guide explores a key tax planning opportunity: making pension contributions. Pension contributions qualify for tax relief at your highest rate, which may be 40% or 45% (41% or 46% in Scotland). The effective rate of relief could be up to 60% (61.5% in Scotland), or even higher, if your pension contributions help you to avoid the withdrawal of child benefit or your personal allowance.

The guide also explains how a self-invested personal pension (SIPP) could help you to take control of your pension, and even to develop your business.

Pensions – less tax now, more income later

The generous tax reliefs successive governments have given to pension arrangements mean that they have long played an important role in tax planning for high earners.

However, since April 2011 increasingly tight restrictions have been placed on these reliefs, just as the rising burden of income tax has made them more valuable. The amounts you can pay in and take out without suffering heavy tax charges have been reduced greatly, but pensions continue to offer significant tax benefits.

The use of pensions in income tax planning is often divided into two areas: pre-retirement and at-retirement, but there is no direct link between physical retirement – stopping work – and drawing on a pension arrangement. You may draw benefits before retirement and make pension contributions after your working life has ended. In practice, it is possible to consider three phases:

- Before age 55 you can pay into a pension but cannot take anything out unless you are in serious ill health.
- Between age 55 and 74 you can pay in or draw out (or do both at once), which gives you real flexibility to manage your income as you move into retirement.

Planning point

If you want to reduce the amount of tax you pay, then the solution is in your own hands. Planning could help you to lessen the rising tax burden.

- From age of 75 you can no longer receive tax relief on pension contributions, but you have a free choice of how much or how little you draw out each year.

Pensions can also play an important role in combatting another tax that may concern you and your family: inheritance tax (IHT). The table below summarises the key tax benefits of pensions.

When contributions are made	Within the annual allowance, individual contributions up to the level of your earnings qualify for income tax relief and employer contributions normally reduce taxable profits.
When the pension fund is invested	The scheme pays no UK tax on investment income or capital gains, although dividend income may have effectively been subject to corporation tax for the company paying it and this cannot be reclaimed.
When you take your pension benefits	Within the lifetime allowance, a quarter of the value is normally available as a tax-free lump sum. Income is taxable, but possibly at a lower rate than when you were working.
When you die	Within the lifetime allowance, if you die before age 75, payments made from your pension fund (as lump sums or income) are normally IHT and income tax free. This applies whether or not you have started drawing income. On death at or after age 75, income tax will apply to benefits.

Planning point

Pension contributions reduce your taxable income so they can help you avoid the phasing out of the personal allowance which starts at £100,000 of income.

Contribution planning

Your personal contributions to a pension normally qualify for income tax relief at your marginal highest rate(s). Most commonly, individuals pay 80% of their contribution and the pension scheme claims the remaining 20% from the Government. These rates apply across the UK, so income taxed at the 19% starter rate in Scotland gets 20% tax relief. If your highest rate of tax is over 20%, you can claim the balance under income tax self-assessment.

Pension contributions reduce your taxable income so they can help you to avoid the phasing out of the personal allowance, which starts at £100,000 of income, resulting in an effective tax rate of up to 60% (61.5% in Scotland). Contributions can also help you to sidestep the additional rate tax band, which starts at £150,000 of taxable income, or the high-income child benefit tax charge, which affects those with income over £50,000.

Example – Pensions tax relief

Esther, who lives in England, has total income of £112,000 for the tax year 2018/19. Her personal allowance is reduced by £1 for every £2 of income over £100,000, meaning she loses £6,000 from her personal allowance. As a higher rate (40%) taxpayer, she pays £2,400 on this extra taxable income. If she makes a pension contribution of £12,000 including the tax relief, this reduces her relevant income and she recovers her full annual allowance. In addition, she gets the full 40% tax relief on the contribution, amounting to £4,800. This means that the £12,000 contribution only costs her £4,800 (£12,000 – £2,400 – £4,800). This is equivalent to tax relief of 60%.

The rules on limits for tax relief are complicated. Total contributions, including deemed contributions to an employer's defined benefit scheme (e.g. a scheme that provides a pension based on your final salary) must be kept within an annual allowance to avoid tax charges. For the tax year 2018/19, this annual allowance is £40,000, but it reduces for those with 'adjusted income' over £150,000 and it is just £10,000 for adjusted incomes of £210,000 and over.

Planning point

Whether or not you wish to maximise your pension contributions, it is well worth taking some trouble with the arrangements.

'Adjusted income' includes pension contributions paid by an employer or deducted from your pre-tax pay in addition to normal taxable income. Regardless of your earnings, the maximum contribution to your pensions (excluding any defined benefit schemes) without tax charges falls to just £4,000 once you have started to receive payments from your pensions flexibly.

Carry forward

There are some special rules that may allow you to catch up on the pension contributions you could have made in the previous three tax years. In 2018/19, you can exploit your unused annual allowance dating back to 2015/16. This is known as 'carry forward'. The rules are relatively complicated in their application, but, in theory at least, if your earnings are high enough and you have not paid into a pension in recent years, it would be possible to make up to £160,000 of pension contributions in 2018/19 with full tax relief.

If this type of planning could be relevant to you, then please seek our professional advice. Both the calculation of unused relief and the identification of contributions to tax years are often not straightforward.

Example – Carry forward

Elaine has paid £20,000 into her pension in the 'input periods' for each of the three tax years 2015/16, 2016/17 and 2017/18. She can carry forward £20,000 (£40,000 – £20,000) from each of these years – a total of £60,000. She can add in £40,000 for the tax year 2018/19 and contribute up to £100,000, assuming she has sufficient earnings to qualify for tax relief on the whole amount and that her adjusted income is not over £150,000.

Making contributions

Whether or not you wish to maximise your pension contributions, it is well worth spending some time on the payment arrangements. If you are an employee, then you (and your employer) can save national insurance contributions (NICs). The secret is for you to reduce your salary or your bonus and ask your employer to use the money, including the NIC saving, to make the pension contributions for you. The technical name for this is salary or bonus sacrifice and it is perfectly legal, if you do it correctly. While the government has recently clamped down on many other salary sacrifice arrangements, it has specifically given the green light to those involving pension contributions. If you pay higher or additional rate income tax, the result could be an increase of around 18% in the amount being paid into your pension.

Importantly, this reduction in your salary would not have the same effect as asking your employer to make the contributions on your behalf. Your cash salary will be reduced and replaced with the pension benefit. Before adopting this pension contribution route, you should consider the effect this may have on:

- Your ability to borrow money, e.g. for a mortgage.
- Your entitlement to redundancy payments and national insurance rebates, state pensions or other benefits such as statutory maternity pay, working tax credit or child tax credit.
- Any life insurance or income protection where the amount paid is linked to your salary.

Planning point

You can hold commercial property and company shares in a SIPP, or you can build up a portfolio of investments.

Taking control of your pension plan – SIPPs

Pension schemes and providers generally offer a wide range of investment funds, which meet the needs of most people. However, if you have already saved a substantial amount, a self-invested personal pension (SIPP) offers you the opportunity to take control of your pension investments. A SIPP gives you a much wider choice of investments to suit your priorities and preferences, and if you have your own business you may be able to use your pension to help develop it tax-efficiently. For example, you can hold commercial property and company shares in a SIPP, or you can build up a portfolio of investments. A SIPP also offers a flexible and tax-efficient way to turn the pension fund you have accumulated into an income for your retirement. There are, however, downsides to SIPPs which will be touched upon later.

What is a SIPP?

A SIPP is a special form of personal pension that allows you, as the pension scheme member, to choose and control the investments within your pension plan. SIPPs are offered by most of the major providers, including investment platforms, insurance companies and specialist pension firms.

The benefits that you can draw from a SIPP and the contributions that can be made are subject to the same rules as any personal pension. The key differentiator is the range of investments available. These vary among providers, with insurance companies typically offering a more limited range that will suit most investors, while specialist providers may offer the full range. Typically, investment options include:

- A very wide range of investment funds.
- Direct investment in stocks and shares.
- Cash deposits.
- Commercial property.

Whilst SIPPs allow a large range of investments, some options may not be appropriate such as residential property, direct investment in overseas property or derivatives.

SIPP as part of your investment portfolio

Most SIPPs include funds and quoted investments, which you may hold alongside your other assets. It is important that your investments are integrated as far as possible and considered together in your financial planning.

A key consideration is ensuring that your investment portfolio balances risk and reward in a way you are comfortable with. This will take account of the time horizon of your investments as well as your individual attitude. This will largely be reflected in asset allocation, which is simply the balance between secure but low-growth investments, such as cash deposits, and more risky but higher-potential investments, such as company shares. You will also need to consider the selection of investment funds/index trackers, which are likely to make up a large part of your portfolio, and ensure they are suitably diversified and reviewed regularly.

The taxation of investments can also help determine whether they are held inside your SIPP or elsewhere in your investment portfolio. Changes to the taxation of interest payments and company dividends from 6 April 2016 – with another reduction to the dividend allowance from April 2018 – may have altered your position.

Consolidating your pensions in a SIPP

Many of us build up several different pensions over the years. Some pension funds may still be with former employers, while others are those we have saved ourselves. Some may have high charges and under-performing investments. Consolidating old pensions into a SIPP can reduce charges and allow investments to be made that meet your needs better.

Planning point

Consider the selection of investment funds which are likely to make up a large part of your portfolio, and ensure they are suitably diversified and regularly reviewed.

This must be done with caution. Some employer schemes have very low charges, so you could pay more after switching to a SIPP and you will need to be confident this is justified by the additional investment flexibility. Even more importantly, you must be careful about giving up guarantees in your old pension arrangements. Some older arrangements, which are usually on a 'with profits' basis, guarantee the terms on which you can convert your pension fund into an income through an annuity. Guaranteed annuity rates can give you a pension that could be twice as high as buying the best annuity available on standard rates today.

Commercial property investment

A major attraction of SIPPs is that certain types can invest in commercial property, although not in residential property.

Commercial property can be let to the pension scheme member's company or partnership. You can even sell a property that you or your business owns to the pension scheme (although this might result in a tax charge on any capital gains). Any sale transaction must use an arm's length valuation, because there are tax penalties for 'value shifting', for example undervalued sales to your pension scheme. Similarly, the business must always pay a full commercial rent, which the SIPP will receive tax free.

Example – SIPP borrowing

Andrew has a SIPP with total assets of £300,000 and a personal pension valued at £100,000. He decides to transfer the personal pension into the SIPP, and can borrow then £200,000 (50% of £400,000) and spend up to £600,000 on a commercial property.

A SIPP can borrow up to 50% of its net assets for property investment (or any other purpose). Often SIPP property purchase is financed by a combination of transfers from previous pension arrangements, new contributions and borrowing.

SIPPs that hold commercial property as an investment normally have higher annual charges than simpler pension arrangements with investments in listed securities, collective funds and cash.

Specialised investments and taxable investments

In theory, almost any investment can be held in a SIPP, but those that are not approved by HM Revenue & Customs are subject to heavy tax charges that make them unattractive. They are known as 'taxable property' and include, for example, residential property, works of art, antiques, fine wine and other collectibles.

The maximum tax charge on taxable property can be 104% of the investment's value, most of which would fall on the member. Some forms of indirect investment in property and chattels are exempt from the tax penalty, but the definitions are strictly drawn.

Planning point

When you decide to draw your pension benefits you have to decide the balance between lump sum and income.

Unfortunately, the way in which the legislation operates will potentially catch a controlling director's pension scheme investing in the shares of their own unlisted company. While there is a limited exemption for indirect investment in chattels with a market value of no more than £6,000, many providers ban investment in chattels and member-related unlisted securities. However, some SIPPs do permit investment in suitably structured residential property funds.

Withdrawing money from your pension

Since 6 April 2015, the rules have provided much greater flexibility once you reach the minimum pension age of 55 (which increases to 57 in 2028). There are no restrictions on how much income you can take each year from drawdown, and you get 25% as a tax-free lump sum at the start, with subsequent withdrawals taxed as income. There are also no restrictions on withdrawals direct from the paying-in part of a pension, but the first 25% you take is tax-free and the remainder is taxed as income. The best way to structure withdrawals from your pension will depend on your personal circumstances.

Example – Drawing from pension

Samira has a SIPP with a value of £600,000. After taking financial advice, she decides to move £300,000 to drawdown and take £100,000 as a lump sum. The £100,000 is tax-free as it is a quarter of the £400,000 total withdrawal. She decides to keep the remaining £200,000 in the paying-in part of her pension until she needs it, when she can take 25% tax-free.

We can give guidance on how you might take lump sums and income from your pension, including ways to combine them with other income sources, what happens if you die and when it may be beneficial to buy guaranteed income through an annuity. We can also help you understand how you can take advantage of the flexibility now available.

How we can help

Retirement planning is complicated, and has been made even more so by constant changes to the rules. We make it our business to stay up-to-date with the latest developments and to help clients take full advantage of the available tax breaks. In particular, we can give guidance on:

- Assessing your financial priorities and choosing suitable pension investments.
- Maximising pension contributions, using carry forward where appropriate.
- Advising whether salary sacrifice could increase the amount invested in your pension at no extra cost to you or your employer.
- The appropriateness of a SIPP and the right investment strategy.
- Transferring existing pension arrangements into your new pension arrangement.
- Managing the move from saving to withdrawing from your pension.
- Minimising IHT liabilities after your death.

The value of tax reliefs depends on your individual circumstances. Tax laws can change. The Financial Conduct Authority does not regulate tax advice.

The value of your investment can go down as well as up and you may not get back the full amount you invested. Past performance is not a reliable indicator of future performance. Investment in a registered pension fund is subject to many restrictions on access and how the funds can be used.
